To meet the demands of consumers, there is an increasing need for food processors to reformulate products using healthier ingredients, adding vitamins, protein, and antioxidants to food, and labeling products as gluten-free, allergen-free, non-GMO, antibiotic free, and organic. Also, sugar is being eliminated, and steps are being taken to extend the shelf life of the food items. Taking these dynamics into account, manufacturers are increasing the use of automation and robotics to bring flexible machinery to efficiently run production lines.

Production and distribution are the two major segments of the F&B industry. While production involves the processing of cheese and meat, and the making of modified food products, alcoholic beverages, and soft drinks, distribution involves the transportation of finished products to the customers. The industry highly emphasizes on mechanical manipulation of technology and raw food items.

Consumers these days are becoming health conscious, and their preferences are shifting to consuming natural and healthier formulations, offering unique flavor profiles. With the trend of adventurous consumers becoming prominent in the past few years, consumers are willing to gain multisensory experiences and explore bolder flavors when it comes to consuming food. Consumer megatrends are shaping the future of the industry range right from local sourcing to on-the-go eating to an increase in organic foods and clean labels.
