The food and beverages sector has experienced rapid growth over the last few years. The growing demand for packaged food has been a major factor in the global food and beverage sector's growth in the last few years. The growing urbanization in developing countries is further likely to drive the demand for packaged food, thus driving the food and beverage sector. Food and beverages cater to the needs of the busy urban populace in a cost-effective manner. Several leading players have ventured into the packaged food market in recent years due to its increasing commercial potential. Packaged food not only serves the need of busy urban individuals by allowing them to cook up meals with minimum prep time, but also allows consumers to sample food from various parts of the world from the comfort of their dining room. The packaged food market is likely to be a major part of the food and beverages sector over the forecast period.

The growing demand for organic food is another major trend in the food and beverage sector. Organic food is grown without the use of artificial ingredients and taking into consideration the overall ecological cycle involved around the crop. As a result, the growing demand for organic food has fit in well with the growing popularity of the ecocommunity movement, with an increasing number of consumers preferring organic food due to its alleged benefits to the environment. Organic food has become widely popular in developed regions, where consumers can easily pay the higher costs of organic food, while the market remains behind conventional foods in developing regions. This is likely to remain the status quo in the organic food market over the coming years, as coming up with produce comparable to conventional produce without using conventional means can be quite costly.
