The consumer goods industry in the past has been harsh from the consumers' perspective with limited products to choose from and retailers with a product and profit-centric approach towards their businesses. However, in the last decade or so, the consumer goods industry has steadily started inching towards a consumer-centric approach because it enables organizations to gain a competitive advantage over their peers. Various value-added services and offers have sprouted from this approach towards business, enhancing the likelihood of customer loyalty, while at the same time, consumers are provided with multiple options to choose from.

Furthermore, the coming years are bringing in exciting technological developments which are poised to create a win-win scenario, benefitting both the companies as well as the consumers. These developments are largely fueled by the rising dedication towards the customer-centric approach undertaken by CP companies. This includes the shift in response to marketplace trends, deepening one-to-one connections with their consumers, and understanding their preferences.

The emergence of the internet has aided consumers to make more informed decisions and forced CP companies to implement cutting edge technology to capitalize on consumer bias. These consumers are engaging with brands digitally, through social media platforms and conducting high-end research; companies are expected to update and adopt innovation unless they want to be outdated.
