These advances are highly influencing various consumption habits, and needs of customers and many industry giants are expected to redesign expansion strategies to gain higher economies of scale.

These industry players are anticipated to capitalize on different benefits by adopting mergers and acquisitions. Other strategical steps undertaken by them include the integration of digital marketplaces and distribution channels, as well as, cashing in on geopolitical situations influencing better trade relations. These trends are likely to set the chemicals industry back on track towards growth, even though they are just emerging.

Among major economies, the US is likely to start spending and investing heftily in the chemicals industry during the forecast period. The chemicals industry is anticipated to mushroom, thanks to increasing production capacity with market players investing in new production facilities and capturing expansion opportunities to scale up.

Europe is assessed to showcase a steady CAGR over the next few years. However, the region is likely to face a difficult year due to the trade turmoil due to political upheaval. Hence, the sale of chemicals in the region are not anticipated to witness striking growth in the next couple of years. In case of no significant setbacks, Germany, the largest chemical industry in the region, is expected to showcase reasonable growth in the upcoming years.
