The worldwide automotive industry is made up of primarily the largest passenger automobile as well as light truck manufacturers. In the vast dealership networks, several industry participants sell vehicles in the worldwide market, in both the developed and emerging economies. Automotive manufacturers provide different makes and models, however, there is restricted brand integration at the advertising, dealership, and marketing levels. A major portion of these companies has production facilities in various regions.

Automobile manufacturers generally deal with the demands of a massive global pool of customers. The overall industry sales are affected by the economic conditions in a particular area. Driving habits are subjected to change as per the economic cycle, and thus, product lineups observe the change with new innovations, technologies, and models. Owing to this, dealerships strive to display a broad range of offerings, whether it is a small compact car or a sedan or even light trucks or sport-utility vehicles (SUVs). Drivers' financial status and taste often vary, on account of which the showrooms will generally have an economy, sports, luxury, and family cars that could cater to customers' desires. Luxury cars with high standards as well as advanced features are sold at a premium price and boast of a rich margin.
