Consumer goods or final goods refer to any product that is bought by average consumers for their consumption. These end result products are directly seen on the store shelf and not used in the production of another good as raw materials. Some of the examples of final products include food & beverages products, clothing, automobiles, packaged goods, electronics, clothing, and jewelry. Consumer goods are categorized into two dynamics, durable and non-durable goods or capital goods. Durable Consumer goods have a significant life span of around 1-3yrs and do not have to be purchased frequently. Home appliances, home & office furnishings, consumer electronics, and lawn & garden equipment, among others, are few examples of durable consumer goods.

Currently, companies operating in the consumer goods industries are adopting innovative strategies to accelerate growth in developed economies such as the US as well as other countries, worldwide. These players identify the latest trends and consumer preferences to gain a competitive edge over their competitors. Simultaneously, they acquire small yet promising companies to strengthen their supply chain and thus to enable access to consumers.
