In view with the increased competition across consumer product, North American companies are positioning themselves beyond the region and well-developed economies to garner growth opportunities. They form partnerships with local brands in the emerging markets in the rapidly developing countries such as India and China. Such alliances help these companies adapt their products to the needs of a specific market.

At the same time, in the Asia Pacific region, governments are trying to foster exports of consumer goods. For instance; on June 12th, 2019, South Korea's Industry Ministry declared that it would lend a hand to exporters of major consumer products, including cosmetics and pharmaceuticals. The government will provide them with financial aid and other support in line with efforts to boost outbound shipments. These support initiatives will initially focus on supporting the top five consumer goods, including fashion items, cosmetics, baby products, pharmaceuticals, and agricultural products.

Reason for choosing these five consumer products is that they have posted strong growth, despite the challenging environment for trade. These initiatives will focus on maintaining the growth momentum of such consumer goods. Under the plan, the government would also help exporters of these consumer products (cosmetics and pharmaceuticals) to tap major stores and popular department stores in the developed regions of the United States and Europe.
