International trade remains the backbone of the ICT industry. Supply chains are increasingly becoming global and interconnected. On the consumption front, consumers gravitate toward the best experience, which often involves hardware, software, and service ecosystems. While convergence remains to be an influential force driving users toward similar experiences, the counterbalance is the demand for localization and personalization, especially among the always-influential youth section of the consumer base. Hence, many countries eagerly import and export technologically advanced products and services from global trade partners to maintain the rising demand and economic value creation.
