Overview

GPS tracking refers to surveillance of a particular location by the Global Positioning System. In the global GPS trackers market, a GPS system helps to track the location of an object or entity remotely. The ground positioning system refers to a constellation of twenty-four well-spaced satellites that orbit around the Earth and make it feasible for people with advanced ground receivers to pinpoint their specific geographic location. However, the location accuracy is anywhere from hundred to ten meters for most devices. Accuracy of tracked location can be pinpointed to within meters with specific military-approved equipment. GPS equipment is effectively utilized in science and has now become sufficiently cost-effective that almost anyone can own it.

Nowadays, almost everyone owns a GPS system in their smartphone, tablet or GPS navigation device. GPS tracking is valuable for several verticals including military personnel, police, firefighters, and big courier companies in the GPS trackers market. Many of these departments use AVL (automatic vehicle locator) systems together with GPS tracking. Automatic vehicle location principally includes a large network of vehicles that are fitted with a GPS receiver, a GPS modem, GPS antenna, and a mobile radio receiver. These position tracking systems are supposed to be an extraordinary innovation in recent times. People depend on GPS assistance to find particular routes in a new city.
