Introduction

Global Wheat Market

Wheat refers to a cereal crop that is widely cultivated across the globe. Wheat is a grass that is usually cultivated for its seed as it is a staple food in different regions. It is an important grain crop that is produced as well as traded globally. The diverse culinary applications of wheat have made it a favorite grain. China is the largest producer of wheat and the fourth largest exporter of wheat across the globe. Wheat is grown on more than one area of land.

The trading of wheat across the globe is greater than the combined trading of all other crops. Wheat finds wide application in food products like bakery items, noodles, pasta, and various other processed foods. Wheat is a rich source of carbohydrates. It is also an important source of proteins, dietary fiber, and nutrients. The latest advancements in technology are boosting the growth of the global wheat market. Wheat can provide the required nutrients to humans and offer other health benefits too.

The growing demand for bread is a major driver for the growth of the global wheat market. The health benefits associated with wheat further augments the market growth across the globe. The use of wheat in demanding food products like pancakes, noodles, pasta, cookies, pastries, and other items propels the market growth. The growing concern about the diseases caused by the consumption of wheat is a potential barrier that restricts the growth of the global market. The global wheat market is anticipated to register notable growth during the forecast period.
