The consumer goods sector is likely to focus on environmental viability in a major way in the coming years. The environmental viability of consumer goods, including the environmental damage caused during the manufacturing of these items as well as the processes and challenges regarding recycling and reuse, has traditionally held low importance for the industry, as major players have focused on padding their bottom lines. However, in the face of increasing government regulations to protect the environment, the consumer goods sector is likely to look to environment-friendly product designs and materials in the manufacturing of said products.
