Overview

The term Lactoferrin (LF) is also known by the name of lactotransferrin (LTF), is a multifunctional protein that entirely belongs to the family of transferrin. The Lactoferrin is a type of globular glycoprotein that has a productive molecular mass of about 80 kDa, which is broadly represented in numerous secretory fluids that collectively include the tears, saliva, milk, and nasal secretions. The Lactoferrin has also had its presence in the secondary granules of the PMNs and is also secreted from some of the acinar cells.

The Lactoferrin can also be purified from the milk or can also be produced in a recombinant manner. The Human colostrum, or commonly termed as the first milk, has the highest level of concentration, which is followed by human milk and then the cow milk. Lactoferrin is one of the crucial components of the immune system of the body that has antimicrobial activity, including the bacteriocide and the fungicide, and is also a part of the innate defense that is mainly at the mucose.

Notably, Lactoferrin is capable of providing antibacterial activities to human infants. The Lactoferrin is capable of interacting with the DNA and the RNA, the polysaccharides, and the heparin. This shows some of the biological functions in the complexes with the help of these ligands
