When the dampers are pressed, mute all the strings other than the ones forming the desired chord. Now the term has colloquially come to be used for any hand-held, chorded zither.

German Akkordzither, Akkordzither, also termed as Volkszither, autoharp, stringed instrument, belonging to the zither family is popular for accompaniment in country, folk, and western music. A musician playing an autoharp generally positions the instrument on a table, rests against the left shoulder, or places on the lap while seated. A musician playing autoharp strums the strings with either a stiff felt or plastic pick held in the right hand. It is commonly played with the thumb of the right hand, with left hand operating the button-controlled bars which damp all the strings except the ones of the selected chords. These musical devices can be tuned diatonically or chromatically. The number of chord bars vary from as few as 3 to as many as 27. 15 and 21 chord models are the most popular ones. Autoharp is generally used to teach simple harmony. Autoharp is used to create country music and is as varied as the voices which continue to move the genre further. Certain tools have become synonymous with the country sound and in varied prominence and several mixes. This tends to appear on many of the renowned country music recordings.
