The Corrugated plastic sheets are created after separating two very thin plastic sheets by other by small plastic beams. They may be retardant for fire or retardant for non-fire. Usually, corrugated plastic is made of polypropylene that can be recycled. The industry also recognizes Fluted (corrugated) polypropylene (PP) sheet for its properties such as lightweight, which is very versatile in application. Over the past few years, the Corrugated Plastic Sheets market has shown impressive growth. This market is forecast to grow steadily across the globe over the next 5 to 6 years. PP has applications into many sectors such as, agriculture, automotive, graphic arts and packaging. Common applications include signage, retail display and trade show, binding / stationary, cabinets as packaging separators or liners, trunk liners for vehicles, and more. Robust, reusable, recyclable, returnable, waterproof fluted containers for shipping polypropylene are superior to corrugated paper. Polypropylene offers good chemical or acid resistance and low absorption of moisture and superior electrical insulation. In the case of microbiological contamination, corrugated fruit and vegetable packaging outperforms returnable plastic crates (RPCs). Trays made of corrugated sheets tend to keep fruits and vegetables fresh for longer period of time.

A new idea has been coined in the market to manufacture roofs using biodegradable substances. As is well understood, the roofing sheet will be subject to natural weathering and biological agents degradation. This type of material will pick up the demand for Corrugated Plastic Sheet slowing down on the roofing market. For example, the production of long-lasting corrugated sheet from woven bamboo mat has shown that biodegradable organic fiber can be used with appropriate technology to make a durable and weather-resistant material for outdoor use.
