to those of the Holocaust. It shows us how renewed intolerance has taken root in our community, institutions, state universities which has far-reaching consequences around the world. The film is executive produced by Dean Cain and Montel Williams, whom both share a passion to aid humanitarian efforts and get such stories told.

"In the 1930s, the world ignored all the early signs of anti-Semitism. Afterwards, we look back in hindsight and wondered why we didn't act before it exploded," said Montel Williams in the film. "The signs are there again. Why are these signs repeating themselves?"

Moved to bring more awareness to the myriad of issues surrounding hate crimes - especially those perpetuated by religion and bigoted ideologies, the producers artfully educate the viewing audience on the history of anti-Semitism. "History tells us that anti-Semitism is a form of bigotry that can easily escalate from rhetoric to violence. In showing audiences what this rising tide of anti-Semitism really looks like, I hope we can contribute to an equally dramatic decline in this dangerous ideology of hate," says Dean Cain.
