About the American Athlete Foundation (AAF)

The mission of the AAF, a 501c 3 nonprofit organization, based in Boca Raton, FL, is to minimize the physical and psychological exposure and impact of concussions and traumatic brain injuries in all athletic activities through improved treatments, research and educational outreach.

The AAF was founded in 2016 by Mike Cline, a former NFLTM player and father of two sons who are currently playing football at the college and high school levels. He serves as the Organization's CEO.

"We established the Foundation to advocate for safety changes and improvements on behalf of the American Athlete and brain injury sufferers across our nation." stated Cline. "We serve as a central resource to support parents and athletes as they progress from youth leagues and high school, to college and through early adulthood. We're creating outreach and educational programs to provide the guidance and advocacy needed to make sports and athletic participation safer through better rules, coaching, equipment and treatment programs. Our goal is to create awareness about these issues and help these young athletes stay healthy and thrive – both now and in the future. These kids deserve our protection and support."

The Foundation sponsors safety, education, concussion treatment protocols and medical research programs.
