

LGBT, Black, and Female: Entrepreneur Glenise Kinard-Moore Makes History with Disruptive Sex Tech Invention, The VDOM

Atlanta-based Glenise Kinard-Moore founded VDOM LLC to specialize in the creation of state of the art prosthetic devices

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, UNITED STATES, March 10, 2020 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Glenise Kinard-Moore is on a mission to humanize sex with her latest invention, the VDOM. She just so happens to be a lesbian, African American, and from one of the fastest-growing startup scenes in the country, Atlanta, Georgia.

Kinard-Moore founded VDOM LLC to specialize in the creation of state of the art prosthetic devices to enhance intimate adult experiences, with an emphasis on the LGBTQIA+ community.

I am empowering people with sexual restrictions or inhibitions to enjoy intimate moments without hassle or awkwardness through a state of the art wearable app-enabled device.”

The VDOM, her first invention, is a patent-pending wearable device that can be completely controlled from its proprietary cyber-secure mobile app. “I am empowering people with sexual restrictions or inhibitions to enjoy intimate moments without hassle or awkwardness through a state of the art wearable app-enabled device,” commented Kinard-Moore.

For LGBTQIA+ persons, particularly queer women and trans men, enjoying intimate moments spontaneously arrives with unique challenges. These challenges are most relevant to instances where partners use a strap-on with one another.

“Sex involving a strap-on is very common within the LGBTQIA+ community. And it can be fun! However, it can also be clumsy as well as difficult, to enjoy sex spontaneously,” added Kinard-Moore.

The VDOM removes this layer of clumsiness via its app-enabled technology, with the ability to go from flaccid to erect at the push of a button.

Sex tech is now projected to be a \$30-billion-dollar industry, with innovators coming forward throughout the world. Even so, very few sex tech founders have addressed the unique needs of queer women and trans men as Kinard-Moore’s VDOM plans to.

Tiffany Ford, founder of up and coming Toronto based VC firm, Co-Fund Capital, is confident that VDOM is set to positively disrupt sex tech.

“VDOM is the perfect impact investment opportunity with a real solution for the FTM community.”

VDOM is currently seeking investment and has launched a crowdfunding campaign on ifundwomen.com which can be supported here.
