Experts and research suggest that the air quality in most homes throughout the country is at a much lower quality than the air we breathe outside. With the constant recycling of indoor air, it's more common for people with asthma, allergies, and other respiratory health issues to feel the effects of not having access to oxygen in its purest form. They have a wide variety of air purification equipment in their warehouses, ready to be installed in the homes and commercial locations that are in need. Now, with the COVID-19 respiratory disease spreading at astronomical proportions, they want everyone that's confined to their homes to have access to these devices, and that's why they are offering deep discounts for new customers and current clients.

For anyone interested, they can call the office to speak with a knowledgeable customer service representatives about their requirements. In most instances, a licensed HVAC contractor will be sent to the residence or business location to do a comprehensive evaluation of their existing equipment and indoor air quality. This is a free service, and the quotes offered after the inspection come with no-obligation to purchase. Everyone can take their time deciding if indoor air purification is something that's worth investing in right now, while so many are facing overwhelming financial burdens. Even if you can't afford a system today, when the expected stimulus checks start to arrive, it's an expense to consider, as air quality purification is something that's beneficial even under normal living conditions.

Another way that the HVAC company is offering assistance is by doing ductwork inspections for those that have noticed issues with energy bills increasing or a higher concentration of dirt, dust, and other allergens floating around. One clear indicator that ductwork is dirty or ineffective is the presence of breathing problems along with the settlement of these contaminants being noticeable on surfaces. The crew has all the tools, equipment, and methods required to get in and check out the condition of ductwork and how polluted it is. People living in their homes for several years that haven't had a ductwork cleaning recently are encouraged to schedule an appointment as soon as possible. Not only will they have the opportunity to breathe better air, but monthly utility bills will also decrease after the service has been performed. Heating and cooling systems will have a clearer path to push air where it's needed to maintain comfort levels.

Superior AC Repair Cypress is aware that many people are hesitant to order services that require an individual that could have coronavirus into their homes for fear of being infected. The company wants everyone to be informed that they are following the strictest protocols for staying healthy, clean, and safe so that they can provide the same high-quality AC Repair services in Cypress, TX they always have without creating more of a problem for the country. For those that are interested in an air quality system installation but they would prefer not to have any contact due to the social distancing guidelines, arrangements can be made over the phone. With permission, technicians will be sent into homes and businesses while the owner is quarantined to another area or ultimately leaves the premises while services are taking place. Payments can be made conveniently over the phone, so there is no reason to speak to or come to close to any one of our licensed and certified HVAC contractors.
