A recent investigation by Haselkorn & Thibaut, a law firm with experience in handling investment loss recovery cases nationwide, revealed potential questionable sales practices by both UBS and Merrill Lynch. The notion that these strategies were conservative income investments was specifically sold to investors. Unfortunately, there is high risk and it has damaged many unsuspecting investors.

Matthew Thibaut, a partner with Haselkorn & Thibaut, and a former defense lawyer with experience representing UBS and Merrill Lynch years ago, said, as to UBS, "it's clear that UBS clients, and in many instances their primary points of contact at UBS, were told one thing (i.e. that the YES Strategy was a conservative approach to 'enhancing one's yield' as the marketing materials state), but that UBS will point to risk disclosure language that it states were properly disclosed in the documents that client received." Mr. Thibaut goes on to say that "UBS cannot fairly have it both ways and play a game of gotcha."

"As former licensed securities brokers and defense lawyers, Matthew and I have internal insights and insights into the complex legal and regulatory issues surrounding this area of law," explained Jason Haselkorn, who has laws of almost 40 years' experience. successfully handling thousands of security cases.
