Specifically, Kelly Hyman has been discussing the concern of people who intentionally spread the coronavirus, specifically in relation to a memo from the Department of Justice that qualified the willful spreading of the virus to another person meeting the statutory definition of bioterrorism. Kelly Hyman noted that people were understandable in their concern that someone may intentionally infect them, and that there should be some kind of penalty and dissuasion for such an act. However, she lamented that proving someone intentionally tried to infect another may be difficult.

Kelly Hyman also gave her thoughts on the stay at home orders that a number of state governors have issued. There has been concern that such orders are unconstitutional, which Kelly Hyman noted that such orders are important, but there have to be limits; for instance, a person who needs to go see a doctor should not be limited in doing so, for obvious reasons. She urged people to exercise common sense regardless; not only to stay safe themselves but to help keep others safe as well. Ultimately, she notes that it is going to come down to a court decision, if any is to come, on the constitutionality, though she believes that the common good may result in the stay at home orders being upheld.
