There may be some parts of the economy that never get back to normal, but there are companies that are still operating during this crisis.”

HCR Wealth Advisors has previously spoken about the future of finance in a post-Coronavirus America when addressing that nationwide businesses will need to continue business as usual in order to avoid an economic depression.

“There may be some parts of the economy that never get back to normal, but there are companies that are still operating during this crisis,” HCR Wealth explained in a conversation with TMC Net. “Furthermore, even if we get back to work in stages, markets will be able to figure out, or at least try to quantify, what this kind of new paradigm looks like. This would enable it to be better at pricing things in.”

The firm also addressed what's likely to happen for homebuyers and those looking to sell. "There is likely to be downward pressure on home prices. Some people will either want to downsize, while others may be out of work. Perhaps the best approach would be to extend the timeframe and not rush things when looking to purchase a home," HCR explained.

Reddit users can participate in the conversation by visiting Reddit thread r/AskMeAnything from 12–3pm EST on Tuesday, June 23. Those who miss the conversation in real-time can also visit the page later to read the full conversation.
