BOYNTON BEACH, FLA., UNITED STATES, June 23, 2020

/EINPresswire.com/ -- With the Coronavirus (Covid-19) curve flattening nationwide, and a Florida governor anxious to get the state open for business again, Boynton Beach real estate broker Jeff Tricoli says the local market is warming up nicely for summer.

Boynton Beach Real Estate

Tricoli points to upticks in showings of his listings in Palm Beach County, and says that buyers have learned to deal with the coronavirus and still buy and sell homes.

"Our Multiple Listing Service (MLS) had 10,057 listings pending in February, before Covid-19 and the shutdown. That dipped to 5,062 pending listings in April," he said. "But May rebounded nicely to almost the level of February. The best part is that June, if it keeps going the way it is, will likely end the month surpassing February's numbers."

Tricoli says that like most people, he was worried at first that the virus scare would hurt the economy in general, and that the local real estate market might take a long time to recover. But he says that doesn't appear to be happening, and believes the market could be in the middle of bouncing back strongly.

"I'm definitely starting to see the gears of the Palm Beach County economy moving again, and not just the real estate market," he said. "Home improvement stores are packed as well. Of course, people are still taking precautions like social distancing and wearing a mask when appropriate, but it's not hard to that people care about their homes."

According to Tricoli, some of the top property types getting buyer interest in Boynton Beach are the waterfront homes.

"I continue to believe this is a good time to sell your Boynton Beach home," he said.
