career paths. Trushant is an insightful business leader with an eye for innovation and ability to identify and overcome obstacles and technical hurdles, which will serve us well as we expand our future offerings.”

Trushant has provided Mission Sisters Who Work board members advice and counsel on several strategic decisions the nonprofit has been considering. “I believe that a thorough understanding of an organization’s mission, the value it creates for its stakeholders, and its working model must be clearly defined in order to design technology-enabled tools that intelligently empower the working lives of employees and those they serve,” says Trushant.

Trushant is Co-Founder and Chief Technology Officer for OpenEyes Technologies Inc., an international IT services organization, partnered with Microsoft and Amazon, and headquartered in Washington, D.C. The company focuses on data integrity and custom software solutions through their ISO certified standards. A Project Management Professional (PMP) and a Certified Scrum Master (CSM) with a master's degree in computer applications, Trushant has cross-domain expertise working with a full range of businesses from federal, state, and international government agencies to corporations, professional associations, and educational institutions.

In 2019 Trushant was selected to serve on the International Data Privacy Sub-Committee for Association for Test Publishers (ATP). Additionally, in 2018 he was selected to serve on the Forbes Technology Council. Members are selected based on their depth and diversity of experience and are part of a community of leading CIOs, CTOs, and technology executives.

In his spare time, in addition to providing advice and counsel to Mission Sisters Who Work and Parul University in India, Trushant is a devoted family man, an active board member for his Homeowners Association since 2007, and an enthusiastic supporter of TED (& TEDx) talks. He also operates an internship program that invests in the professional development of university students working with OpenEyes Technologies.
