From the past decade, the courier, express, and parcel (CEP) industry has been witnessing high growth rates across the world. E-commerce is the major growth driver of the CEP market, generating significant revenues for the industry. In recent years, growth in e-commerce business was leading to an increase in business opportunities for shipping goods.

The CEP industry is posting impressive growth in the developing countries, driven by the growth in international trade, rising internet and smartphone penetration boosting the e-commerce sales, growing middle-class population and disposable incomes, and improved standards of living.

Besides e-commerce, the emerging trends of omnichannel retailing in certain countries and growth in trade driven by economic growth are also some of the drivers of the CEP industry. The lack of proper infrastructure and technology leading to inefficiency is one of the factors hindering the growth of the market.

The last-mile delivery is the crucial piece of logistics, and final mile delivery costs represent almost half of the supply chain costs. Owing to this reason and to accommodate the rising demand to reach the consumer expectations, the CEP companies are integrating the last-mile delivery to the existing services. A huge transformation is taking place in the last-mile delivery, with companies looking at alternatives, such as delivery lockers, pickup points, crowdsourced deliveries, drone deliveries, and autonomous vehicles.

The evolution of technology is reshaping the entire supply chain and reinventing the parcel industry. Technology is becoming a crucial enabler in increasing efficiency and reaching consumer expectations.
