increasingly crowded space.

First Things First; Why Vietnam?

Over the last few years, Vietnam has been increasingly attracting the attention of multinationals—and for good reason.

The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development \(UNCTAD\), notes that the Asian country's garment and textile industry attracted foreign direct investments of over $1.55 billion in 2019. And according to figures by Statista, the export turnover of Vietnam's apparel industry reached an impressive $36 billion.

The growth of Vietnam's garment industry is attributed to several factors including:

- Lower labor costs: Statistics show that Vietnam has lower labor costs than major competitors such as Cambodia, Indonesia, and China. This gives the country a competitive advantage by increasing the cost-saving of global buyers.

- Vietnam has a well-developed infrastructure—including 160 international ports, 3 international airports, and efforts to improve railway and expressway infrastructure.

- Vietnam has a long tradition in the apparel industry that it leverages—in addition to an appetite for modernization and innovation to keep up with global demand/trends. The products are typically easy to transport, cheap, and high quality.

- The country has reputation for maintaining stable relationships with global buyers and customers. Its main
