“Even though the LGBTQ community's needs have largely been ignored by the financial services industry, I have fought and will continue to fight to give the community a chance at real wealth creation,” said David, who has more than 30 years of experience in the industry. “My information is unvarnished and gets to the heart of how to invest and what to look for in an up or down market.”

There is a void in the financial services industry regarding the LGBTQ community and its finances, and Queer Money Talks was created to address it. "I have seen first-hand the reluctance of many LGBTQ people to work with the financial services industry because trust is low. There is an impression that the financial services industry is old, white, male, straight, conservative, and unwelcoming. I am an openly gay man, and this show aims to specifically help LGBTQ people with their money," Treece said. Financial planning and values for saving for retirement, paying off debt, building credit scores and other life goals are not one-size-fits-all, and this show addresses the specific needs of LGBTQ people.

LGBTQ older adults face growing challenges, which may include special health and retirement planning scenarios including choosing a long-term care facility or retirement village that is LGBTQ-friendly. In some cases, same sex partners find themselves sadly alienated from family and if something goes wrong, they may not have someone legally designated to make decisions for them.

Additionally, physical and mental health needs, as LGBTQ members age, can be different and have to be part of long-term healthcare financial requirements. That comes as LGBTQ members are still confronted with the reality that they are not allowed to make decisions for their partners without certain protocols in place.

David tackles these tough topics and fields a wide variety of questions including how to best deal with credit card rewards, how do trusts work and what to do if you get a notice from the IRS.

David said, "I am thrilled to be given the opportunity to help give advice weekly to my LGBTQ community in this national forum. There is a real need for this now more than ever with the pandemic. I want to be part of what helps someone receive their most fabulous life."
