

The Black Lives You Don't Hear About in the News Still Matter

Join The Sister to Sister podcast every Tuesday Hosted by Women's Prosperity Network

FORT LAUDERDALE, FL, US, December 14, 2020 /EINPresswire.com/ -- In these divided times, Women's Prosperity Network is proud to host the Sister to Sister podcast, a weekly conversation with women of color that reveals the one-on-one, every-day impact of racism. Rather than debating the controversial issues of systemic racism, white privilege, discrimination, white supremacy and the many arguments surrounding racism, the guests simply share what they've experienced in their daily lives.

'Life was better for slaves before being freed.' Imagine sitting in an academic lecture hall and hearing a lecturer say that. Can you imagine being a black person and hearing it?"

Trish Carr, host Sister to Sister

Yes, there are stories of overt racism – watching a KKK parade on 'main street,' not being invited to a white friend's family home because you're black, a white mother whose parents were embarrassed by having black grandchildren - but it's also the offhand comments born of ignorance that are just as hurtful. Whether it's referring to a black woman as "gal" (a term that cuts to the core as a sign of disrespect as 'House Gal' was a slave term), touching a woman's braids, natural curl or cornrows, or commenting how 'well-spoken' a person of color is, these are micro-aggressions about which most white people are simply ignorant.

Viewers are invited to listen with an open mind and open heart to real stories from real people and find out how they can take action to drive change. Guests come from all walks of life, everyone from PhD's to stay at home moms. They illustrate person-to-person racism as well as systemic racism, such as the 12-year army veteran, best-selling author and parenting expert whose 7-year old son was labeled "special needs" and put into remedial classes simply because he fit the profile of black male with a single mother. After uncovering that designation, she fought to have him tested AND found that rather than too slow, he was 'exceptional' and moved into advanced programs.
