How to Find the Right Roofing Contractor in Downriver Michigan for The Job

There are many different types of roofing that are available for homes today but the most used type of roofing in Michigan is asphalt shingle roofing. When you need repair or replacement on your home's roof you will need to find a roof contractor that services the type of roofing you have. If you have the popular asphalt shingle roofing then most roofing companies will offer this service. However, if you have any other type of roofing your choices may be limited when it comes to roofing companies.

Hiring a stranger is never easy, especially when you are relying on them to take care of such an important part of your home. Roofing contractors can get a bad reputation because there are many who do not follow rules and regulations. But you can weed out the problematic roofers from the professionals if you know what to look for.

Stay Local

There are a lot of benefits to staying local when hiring a contractor. Firstly, you can have better communication and work together more easily when there isn't a large commute to be made.

You can ask questions and see more in person examples of their work when they are already in the area. Another plus to staying local is that they are familiar with how things are done and what permits are necessary for the job.

Get At Least Three Quotes

You don't want to be overcharged for a job, but also don't want to get work done too cheaply. Someone who gives you a drastically low number for a quote on the work will either do a very poor job, or add charges along the way. By getting at least three quotes, you can see a range of prices and can better judge what contractors will charge. If someone is charging much less than the others, you should not view that as a good thing. The more quotes you get, the better your averages will be.

Check Their License

Never work with any contractor that is not fully licensed in your area. It is important because only contractor licensed in that state or area can pull permits and do work legally. Licenses don't just mean that they can pull permits, but that the contractor has gone through the necessary steps to do their work legitimately.

Make Sure They Have Insurance

Only licensed contractors can be insured, and insurance is an absolute must. Especially in roof work, the possibility of accidents is there. You don't want to be stuck paying for damages they created or injuries they obtained on your property. You also don't want to spend time in court battling over who owes who and who was at fault. Insurance covers any errors on their part, eliminating the blame game.

Ask for Referrals

You should always ask around and check online for reviews on the contractor's past work. But you also need to get them to provide you with referrals. These are previous clients he has done work for that you can call to confirm with. This is your time to ask questions and see what they really think of the work they paid for. Is it still holding up? Were there any issues? Was the contractor professional? Plan out some questions and make sure you get a real idea of what they went through.

Get Everything in Writing

No matter how trustworthy they may seem, or even if you have worked with them before, always have a written contract. This is a way to make sure both parties are on the same page and everything is consistent. It also holds both parties accountable and makes sure that everything is written out for reference.
