COVID-19 is essentially a respiratory ailment. It complicates some of the pre-existing health conditions in patients leading to death. During hospitalization a small percentage of patients require assisted breathing; i.e. these patients need ventilators. With the drastic increase in the overall case of COVID-19, demand for ventilators and other medical equipment's have increase, this has created a gap between the demand and supply of ventilators and medical equipment's across the majorly affected countries. Some estimates suggest that the demand for ventilators would reach to around 5-10% of the total cases. It is estimated that world may need millions of ventilators in the coming weeks and months to deal with COVID-19 situation. Government across the world has told ventilators manufacturers in their region to rapidly increase their production capacity to cope with the ever increasing ventilator demands while some other has put ban over its export. While the COVID-19 cases are on the rise, it seems there are not enough ventilators available in hospitals right now for all of the potential patients who will be struck by the virus. The only way to avoid overwhelming intensive care units is with a mandatory lockdown that reduces social contact by 75%.

Ventilator shortages are a vital fact, as the epidemic of COVID-19 continues to deteriorate. Health ministries all over the world face the same dreadful equation. In order to prevent the deaths of tens of thousands, even hundreds of thousands, the manufacturers have already boosted their production to maximum by themselves. Today, they aren't receiving orders from regular customers like hospitals only but also directly from the governments. For instance: Hamilton Medical, which usually produces about 15,000 of the devices a year, has ramped up production about 40%, because of the COVID-19 outbreak.
