Preprocessor (PHP) has been the basic choice of every web developer for a long. It has powered many successful content management systems like WordPress, Drupal, and Joomla. It is dedicatedly used for server-side scripting and makes extensive use of HTML, JavaScript, and CSS. It makes use of multi-threaded blocking I/O to carry out multiple tasks to run parallel tasks. The composer package manager, presence of lots of frameworks, use of context switching, making use of a mix of traditional and modern databases and the CMS can handle bulky blog sites. It works on the client-server model. Every page request initiates the application, database connection, and HTML rendering and configuration parameters. But it is good enough for web application development and to create blogs, landing pages, news sites or writing CMS with all sorts of customizations like a well-documented API to change application's structure, presentation, plug-ins, infinite customizable themes etc. It is a helpful resource in case hosting is an issue, is more flexible in integration and deployment for shared hosting service instead of a full-fledged virtual cloud instance.
