

How to take control of your financial future even during a pandemic

Inspiring new book features 16 women who overcame challenges to find success and purpose as entrepreneurs

USA, January 4, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Real estate entrepreneur Mandy Branham and her husband used to be ideal employees. They fully gave themselves to their jobs, were successful, had a lovely house, two kids, a wonderful life. Then, through no fault of their own, the crash of 2008 came and their ideal life threatened to disappear. "We had the carpet pulled out from underneath us and we realized that we actually didn't have control of our financial future," she says.

So she and her husband leapt into unknown entrepreneurial waters, learning all they could, first from experiences in network marketing, then from personal development gurus, and finally from their own research. They wanted the answer to a basic question: "What business sector can we enter into where the harder we work, the more direct results we get out of our effort?" The answer came in a free seminar: real estate. After investing in some more education about it, they bought a property and made $50,000 in 20 days. They were off and running.

Mandy has a lot of wisdom to share, not just about real estate but about taking the leap into working for yourself. One thing she realized early on was "I needed to protect who I talk to about stuff, because other people's fears could influence my decisions." And not just that, she also had to overcome a feeling of why she should be striving for more when she had a good life already. "It's a hard thing to break out of. I had to get over the mind game of, 'Who are you to want more, Mandy?'" She believes everyone deserves more, and she includes community service and housing the homeless in her work as well.
