3. Hotspot Shield - Hotspot Shield is one of the few VPN companies that is offering both a free and paid version of its service. When a company offers both a free and paid tier, you usually expect the worst since it is incentivized to get you to jump up to a paid plan. But with Hotspot Shield, they offer their customers up to 500MB of data usage per day for free, the ability to connect five devices simultaneously, a one-click connection, and more.

4. Cyberghost - Cyberghost offers a free Chrome VPN extension, proxy to be more specific, which you can set up in no time. The extension is quite simple with only an on/off button and the menu to choose the locations. But, if you want full protection, you'll have to choose between one out of their four plans available. With monthly subscriptions being expensive, your best bet would be one of the yearly plans.

You may check-out CyberGhost through this link:

5. Hide.me - hide.me offers a user-friendly extension for Google Chrome. While they promise their users to never experience throttle on your connection, their data usage is capped at 2GB per month. That's enough for about seven hours of SD streaming or 30 hours of browsing, which is plenty for a day but not a lot for a whole month. They can also unblock a handful of streaming sites, but you still need to test different servers to find out which will work. The monthly data cap also severely limits your streaming ability. And for free users, torrenting is only permitted to three servers so if you're far from such locations, you will be struggling with slower connections.
