

Cold-Weather Preparations for Your Home's Basement: Tips from a Local Rhode Island Basement Waterproofing Company

The worst of the North Eastern winter is yet to come. Keep your home and family safe this winter by making these preparations.

PROVIDENCE, RI, 02909, January 19, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Basement Waterproofing of Rhode Island is providing tips and knowledge to local Rhode Island residents for winterizing homes in the New England region. With many years of experience in the waterproofing industry, they know what water does to structures, and they are eager to share ways to prevent the damages in an easy to understand format.

"Basement waterproofing is one of our most requested services in Rhode Island. We typically prefer to perform waterproofing and other winterizing jobs in the fall, but we want the community to know that we are available year-round. Our primary focus is to assist in protecting the stabilities of all building types," the owner and operator of the company said recently.

BEFORE- Basement Waterproofing Services RI

Basement waterproofing in RI is a proven technique to ensure residential properties do not deal with water infiltration after the winter snow melts. For those living in the state for the winter season, it's apparent that snowfall can be heavy at times. It needs somewhere to go when the temperatures go back up. Unfortunately, that's often into the basement.

Why should basement waterproofing be done? Reasons include the damages that it causes to structures through rot and deterioration of the building materials, mold growth, destruction of personal property, and unhealthy living conditions. The professionals from Basement Waterproofing of Rhode Island are passionate about their industry, and they genuinely care about the safety and comfort of everyone they serve.

Prior to the cold-weather arrival, one way to prevent problems is by scheduling a waterproofing service. The experts will start with a thorough and complimentary evaluation of the structure's foundation, ensuring no detail is overlooked. With their highly-trained eyes, they can detect even the tiniest foundation crack where water is getting in. What may seem insignificant now can expand and contract with the changing weather and create the perfect place for moisture and even unwanted pests to infiltrate.

Next, the basement waterproofing contractors share their findings with the client and recommend basement waterproofing procedures. If the home isn't on a basement foundation, they also do crawlspace waterproofing and other applications to protect the building. The free quote includes the types of superior quality materials they will use, a timeframe for completion, and the final cost. The team is respected in the area for never pressuring any client, and they are well-known for delivering the best results.

Sometimes, the foundation waterproofing may include a new sump pump in RI installation. If it's unknown how old the existing sump pump is or if it's not operating as it should, it's an expense worth considering. Optimal drainage is the only way to get water out and away from the structure when it reaches the basement. Some customers may also benefit from a French drain installation, and the honest contractors will review all the possibilities during the inspection.

One of the employees from Basement Waterproofing of Rhode Island stated, "As basement waterproofing in RI specialists, there's only so much we can do. We produce every service possible as a foundation repair company, but there are some things we instruct our customers to do independently for even further protection."

Substantial grading is one way to keep water away from a foundation, and that's a job that can be completed by adding soil to the space around the exterior perimeter. Landscaping companies do this for those who want to pay a professional, or it is relatively easy as a DIY project. Trees, shrubs, and other foliage can be added for increased curb appeal and to ensure the soil stays put too.

Cleaning out gutters and downspouts is a common winterizing tactic as well. Property owners are urged to have gutters cleaned in fall and the spring, so that melting snow and other precipitation has a clear path away. Redirecting downspouts outwardly is also crucial to protect the integrity and avoid costly foundation repair requirements in the future.

For anyone who has failed to handle their cold-weather preparations in time, there is always the option of clearing away the snow close to the house manually before it melts. It may not be a foolproof method for basement waterproofing, and some water could potentially still sneak in. However, the more snow that can be relocated to another location a fair distance away, the greater the chance it will be absorbed into the soil before it winds up in the basement.
