As a 15-year veteran emergency medicine physician in the ever-growing city of Nashville, TN, Dr. Dorsha has seen what happens when people come to the hospital for non-life-threatening issues. “Unfortunately for some, the ER is the only place they can receive their care but ER’s are often overcrowded with extended wait times. myURGENCYMD provides patients with the ability to see a doctor from the comforts of home, bypassing doctor’s offices and waiting rooms and without the large hospital bill,” said Dr. Dorsha.

For those without health insurance, telemedicine is a good option until they can obtain coverage and for those with insurance, telemedicine is a great supplemental service for companies that don’t offer it as part of their coverage. Anyone can become a member and telemedicine allows anyone with smart phone access to non-emergency health services for a total cost of $24.95 a month or less than $300 a year. Another perk is one membership can be utilized by a household of up to seven people. The service is unlimited so members can schedule appointments as needed. It has no co-pays or additional fees and has a Spanish experience for those who need it.

myURGENCYMD has board-certified doctors you can talk to on your smart phone or computer.

In late 2020, myURGENCYMD created an initiative that specifically targets HBCUs and other colleges and universities that want to be able to provide health services to students around the clock. Tennessee State University, in Nashville, Tennessee, was the first to partner with the organization and provides myURGENCYMD’s services to its more than 7,000 students free of charge. This is especially useful during the COVID-19 pandemic as colleges and universities across the United States saw a significant increase in the number of students taking on-line courses making it difficult for them to utilize services provided by student health centers located on campus.

myURGENCYMD also provides mental health services. Many factors have caused an increase in depression and anxiety making access to mental health care imperative. A myURGENCYMD membership includes unlimited access to a Master’s Level Therapist and members also have a 100% guaranteed follow-up with their original therapist.
