About 95 percent of moms still use the disposable variety, but in recent years, the production and popularity of reusable diapers have increased dramatically. Whether for eco-friendly concern, cost, or pure convenience and style, many parents are opting to use cloth diapers these days. The alternative to cloth diapering is disposable diapers, with pros and cons to consider no matter which method you decide is best for your family. In the early years, the diaper was made of a rectangular piece of white cotton fabric around the baby's bum secured by large pins. modern cloth diapers have greatly changed since then. Many parents are opting for cloth diapers as they are cost-effective and more natural, or simply to avoid chemicals on the babies' sensitive skin. The increased preference for cloth diapers is expected to boost the global baby diaper market in the forecasted period.
