Tucker began riding horses at a young age, and now she is happy to continue sharing this experience with her two girls. She hopes to continue this tradition with her girls as she molds and shapes them into responsible, courageous females while having a little bit of fun.

Tucker goes on to share, “There is something about ponies and horses that little girls in particular find appealing. Maybe it's their mystical beauty, those chiseled faces with long flowing manes and tails. It might also be the power a young girl feels as she leads or rides an animal ten times her weight. It could also be the confidence being around horses and ponies instills in a young girl. Trotting, cantering, and flying over jumps via horseback is harder than it looks and requires a certain level of perseverance and bravery. No matter what it is about horses that young girls find appealing, horses are good for girls.”

She continues to share, "sharing a love of horses with a young girl and giving them the opportunity to ride is a gift that gives so much. It's the opportunity to overcome challenges and develop lifelong skills that will serve well over the course of a girl's lifetime. Tucker shares a few of the many life lessons that being around horses can provide girls with, including the development of resilience, focus, compassion, responsibility, and the instilling of discipline.
