

Non-Profit Expert Answers Research Noting Role of Self-Doubt in Limiting Leaders' Effectiveness

Post-Pandemic Research Shows Self-Leadership Agility is Key to Success

WINTER PARK, FL, UNITED STATES, June 9, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- As researchers begin to explore the role of effective leaders in a post-pandemic society, Marc Pitman's new book "The Surprising Gift of Doubt: Use Uncertainty to Become the Exceptional Leader You Are Meant to Be" provides a roadmap for identifying those who are broken and those who are exceptional.

As Pitman readily acknowledges, "Leading can be so disorienting." He explores how too many leaders never reach their full potential because they allow the nagging self-doubt to reduce their effectiveness. He advocates for leaders to use the doubt as a reminder to focus inward by zeroing in on three areas of growth: hardwiring, identity and goals. Pitman provides more than just information and examples of leaders who followed his advice. He provides readers with proven steps to take on their own journey toward exceptional leadership, steps he uses as part of his coaching and consulting practice.

Scholars studying effective leadership in modern society note the volatility, uncertainty, chaos and ambiguity that confound today's corporate and non-profit leaders. They have begun to identify behavioral competencies that non-profit leaders. They have begun to identify behavioral competencies that separate effective leaders from those who cannot successfully navigate the confounding environment. "Self-leadership agility" is one of the key competencies. Pitman's "The Surprising Gift of Doubt" provides ineffective leaders with the tools to develop that agility.

Learning to tend to selfdoubt by becoming curious about yourself, you gain focus and confidence."
