

Sexual Abuse Victims Need Legal Representation to Protect Their Rights and Hold Those Responsible Accountable.

As more states create a look-back window for victims who were sexually abused as children and teens, more survivors will have a chance to be heard in court.

ALLENTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, US, June 29, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ --

As more states create a look-back window for victims who were sexually abused as children and teens, more survivors will have a chance to be heard in court. That can only happen with the help of attorneys.

We hope this spotlight on sexual abuse claims around our great nation has given some law firms a wakeup call.”

About a quarter of American girls and one in six boys will be sexually assaulted before they turn 18, according to Deborah Khoshaba Psy.D., who wrote an article in Psychology Today. Less than ten percent will tell anyone about it, and just six to eight percent will report it.

Victims are suffering because of human traffickers, religious organizations, schools, summer camps, sports organizations, and individuals. Many of them have viable legal claims against these types of defendants. They need attorneys willing and able to represent them.

Opening deadlines to file legal actions helps victims get closure for a traumatic time in their life that may have happened decades ago. By holding abusers responsible, lawsuits can lead to closure, which provides a final chapter to a traumatic time in the lives of sexual abuse victims.
