“Now in its eighth year, The Washington Post's Top Workplaces list continues to highlight the companies in the Washington area that are leaders in company satisfaction and engagement,” said Washington Post Top Workplaces editor Dion Haynes. “Throughout the past 15 months, these companies have had to make quick decisions in order to keep their employees safe while also balancing productivity and efficiency, and their employees have taken note of this great work.”

CollabraLink's CEO, Rahul Pandhi, said, “Our team is once again honored to be selected as one of The Washington Post's Top Workplaces for 2021. As an executive team, we are having deliberate conversations all the time on culture, on the direction that we want to go,” Pandhi said. “We're constantly asking people for their feedback and then acting on that information. The feedback received from our team using the Energage platform has allowed us to fine-tune our operational model to help continuously evolve our corporate culture and adapt as an organization, particularly to challenges everyone faced over the past year. Based on the 2021 Top Workplace results, I'm pleased to see we've made significant strides towards improving as an organization and look forward to continued improvement based on team feedback. For me, this award validates the commitment our team has made to operating with integrity, serving as stewards for our clients, working as a team, holding each other accountable for our choices and actions, and ultimately, ensuring we operate with unwavering respect for the individual."
