What's a cookout without the perfect steak?

With our compliments, here's one way to make a perfect seared steak on a gas grill. (For more tips for grilling, visit thespruceeats.com.)

1. Choose a quality cut, 3/4- to 1-inch steak with moderate marbling, which tends to enhance flavor, juiciness, and tenderness.
2. Generously season both sides of the steak with salt and pepper.
3. Let the steak come up to room temperature (about 1 to 2 hours).
4. Pre-heat your grill to 500 degrees Fahrenheit.
5. Set a timer for 1 minute.
6. Quickly open the grill lid and place your steak on the grill. Be quick so you don't lose heat (you are trying to sear each side of the steak to lock in juices and flavor).
7. Close the lid and start the timer.

8. After one minute, lift the lid and flip the steak. Use tongs or a metal spatula. Don't use a fork. You don't want to pierce the meat and let juices escape.
9. Reset and start the timer for one minute.
10. When the timer goes off, reduce the cooking temperature to low-medium and open the grill cover (take your time so the grill temperature drops).
11. Flip the steak and rotate it 90 degrees before placing it back on the grill (this will give you nice "X" shaped grill marks).
12. Close the grill and start a timer for 2 minutes (rare to medium/rare), 3 minutes (medium), or 3.5 minutes (medium-well). Avoid cutting the steak to check for doneness. Instead press on the meat with your finger, taking care not to burn yourself. While this method may take some trial and error, essentially when a steak is done "rare," the finger poke feels soft to the touch; for "medium," it is pliant but somewhat firm (like pressing against the meaty part of the palm beneath your thumb), and for "well," the steak feels solid to the touch.
13. When the timer goes off, open the grill and flip the steak again, rotating it to achieve the aforementioned x-shaped grill marks.
14. Reset the timer and finish cooking the steak for two, three, or 3.5 minutes depending on the level of doneness desired.
15. When the timer ends, turn off the grill and remove the steak. Place it on a clean platter (not the same one you seasoned the steaks on unless it's been washed).
16. The steak will continue to cook off the grill. After a few minutes, it will be ready to serve! Bon appétit!
