effects of multiple possibilities. Sextortion is a frequent reason for this. From the words sex and extortion, the victim took explicit photos and videos for whatever reason. When another person gets a hold of the content, they may use them as a bargaining tool to get money or other requests. They may spread it on multiple sites on the web like social media sites, forums, or pornography websites. As soon as there is a definite spread of compromised information, these should be reported and dealt with as quickly as possible to avoid a more significant problem.

Victims may be hacked through their mobile phones, computers, or cloud storage in the digital age. Our data is just as vulnerable as our physical selves. An acquaintance may borrow our phones thinking they would not harm, but the possibilities are endless. Connecting to an unsecured wireless connection could compromise our information to the wrong hands. Suspects may be people you know or people you have never interacted with before.

The spread of revenge porn is tremendously unsafe for the victims, severely affecting their mental well-being. If you know victims of non-consensual materials being spread, be sure to comfort them as much as possible. They might overwhelm themselves with guilt, regretting ever making sultry content even if it was never meant for the public eye. If you are a victim of these heinous crimes, it is best to stay calm and positive. Thanks to multiple laws and services, this phenomenon will not last forever.

REMOVE REVENGE PORN FROM THE WEB

There are many things to consider when planning how to remove revenge porn materials off the internet. You may want to keep a piece of evidence that it has spread in some sources of the internet to make your case credible. If you can access it through the phone or internet, taking a screen capture would help in considering it as evidence. The platforms may vary from pornographic sites, forums, or even message conversations.

It may not always work, and you may not know who, but consider telling the publisher to remove the content if you happen to know them. If there is a way to contact the website where it was posted, you can send a report or contact a support team to handle your case. These may not always work, especially in pornographic sites. Many administrators do their best to conceal their real identities due to the nature of their work and may avoid dealing with your case immediately.

You should also report the incident to multiple search engines like Google or Bing. Once the photos and videos are easily accessible in search engines, it will allow more people to view the sensitive materials.

It may be a difficult thing to do, but it is best to give your family, friends, and colleagues a heads up. Telling them will help them understand that you did not provide your consent in sharing it to the public when they come across the malicious contents. They may also be supportive and helpful in finding other methods to remove the materials on the internet.

Many places around the world have existing laws to protect victims and incriminate suspects of spreading revenge and non-consensual porn. Reporting this to your local police can help your cause, especially if they have a cybercrime division ready to use the tools at their disposal. If the identity of the original publisher is known or any other people who helped in distributing the contents, providing enough evidence could go well in the victim's favor.

The Digital Millennium Copyright Act, also known as the DMCA, is a copyright law in the United States that criminalizes the production and distribution of potentially copyrighted works. There are many services that takedown content off the internet because those materials may be considered published because of piracy.
