

70% of Survey Respondents Report Nonprofit Employees are Still Primarily Remote

New Survey Results Reveal How Nonprofit Leaders are Transitioning Back to the Workplace

WASHINGTON , D.C., UNITED STATES, July 15, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- As employers grapple with when and how to physically return their people to the workplace, it is clear that where work gets done in a post-pandemic world is less important than in prior decades. To better understand how the social impact sector adapted, Nonprofit HR surveyed nonprofit and social impact leaders across the U.S. to share insights on progress, concerns and lessons learned from implemented return-to-workplace and work-from-home plans.

While 62% of respondents consider their organization's remote work experience successful, and 78% reported unanticipated positive benefits from going remote, there are challenges and nuanced circumstances that remain surrounding what to do next, including:

The top four employee concerns surrounding a return to the workplace include risk of infection, use of public transportation, lack of childcare and mistrust of others following safety protocols.”

2021 Nonprofit Return to Workplace Survey Results

- More than half of respondent organizations are considering future remote work options for any position that accommodates it.
- The top four management concerns are maintaining company culture, collaboration and teamwork, productivity and engagement, and effective communication.
- The top four employee concerns surrounding a return to the workplace include risk of infection, use of public transportation, lack of childcare and mistrust of others following safety protocols.

- Half of responding organizations did not require a COVID-19 vaccine to return to the workplace; instead, they have implemented several parameters to keep employees safe.

- The majority of respondents reported up to 25% of their staff relocated during the pandemic – of those that relocated, 50% relocated out-of-state, 42% in-state and 9% abroad.
