The Canadian Health Care Sector Faced A Lot Of Challenges During The COVID-19 Pandemic.

The coronavirus pandemic has truly tested the healthcare systems of every country across the globe, and Canada is no exception. Hospitals and clinics have faced an unprecedented influx of patients and emergencies and left many unattended or put on long waiting lists.

In truth, the national healthcare system has been overwhelmed and overburdened long before the arrival of Covid19. A study by Fraser Institute, published in 2020, indicated that there was an average waiting time of over 22 long weeks between the initial checkup and the actual treatment. These numbers are simply staggering for a country that is known as one of the finest welfare states.

Masses Are Readily Adopting Telemedicine Services For Health Care Needs.

I believe in educating patients to prepare them for the right questions to ask when seeing their family practitioner or the emergency doctor. Your Doctors Online allows me to do just that.”

Dr Asim Cheema

Fortunately for many waiting on those long and tedious lists, there has been the efficient alternative of Telemedicine. More and more people are switching to online expert consultation for their basic checkups and diagnosis.

A recent survey conducted by CMA (Canadian medical association) revealed that the satisfaction rate for virtual care services was 91%, as reported by the patients. There has been a 36 percent increase in virtual medical consulting sessions since the start of the pandemic. This clearly shows that telemedicine is not only popular but will become the norm for diagnosis and care in not so distant future.
