EINPresswire.com/ -- Memory is often a fragile thing. We often tie the existence of something to what memories we have of it. It is what decides histories and cultures for most people. To be remembered is often how we know certain people exist. The capacity to do so is of great importance to humanity.

But as it is, some memories can fail.

Thanks in part to dementia and Alzheimer's disease, we are able to give a name to what takes away from this important human experience. But through hope in God's remembrance who provides a sense of purpose in the face of this disease. We need to recognize something deeply powerful that calls us to remember while we can but to trust that God will remember for us when we cannot. In "Alzheimer's & Theology: Theological Dynamic of the Human Experience of Dementia," one can explore how trusting in God can help greatly when dealing with such conditions.

necessarily lead to the end of their lives. Through God's love and Christ, one can draw hope and a sense of purpose despite the challenges of the disease.
