Food preservatives refer to chemical substances added into beverages and processed food to prevent harmful microorganisms from growing and deterioration, contamination, and spoilage of ingredients. Vinegar, sugar, salt, nitrites, citric acid, calcium propionate, etc., are some of the commonly used preservatives. They aid to decrease wastage, assure safety, enhance supply, and extend the shelf-life of the food.

Market Trends:

The high preferences for hygienically packaged food products with growing concern towards maintaining health and hygiene standards is primarily driving the product demand globally in processed food items such as bread, snacks, cheese, yogurt, sauces, deli meats, etc. Furthermore, inflating consumer per capita income levels coupled with hectic work schedules and sedentary lifestyles have led to the increasing demand for ready-to-eat (RTE) food items. Moreover, the rising popularity of organic preservatives and clean label ingredients among health-conscious consumers is acting as another growth-inducing factor. Additionally, the emergence of natural, soluble, and non-toxic product variants that assist in retaining the natural color, nutritional value, freshness, and texture of the food item, is further catalyzing the market growth.
