Health insurance refers to a service that provides coverage for medical and surgical expenses incurred from an illness or injury. It offers multiple arrangements to the insurance holder, such as managed care plans, indemnity, and point-of-service (POS) plans. Health insurance covers various treatment expenditures, including medicines, hospitalization, ambulance, doctor consultation, and daycare costs. It is generally offered by an employer, wherein premiums are partially paid by employees and the rest is covered by the company.

The inflating costs of healthcare services, in confluence with the increasing prevalence of chronic diseases, are primarily driving the UAE health insurance market growth. The government is enforcing laws to provide compulsory health insurance to residents, which is acting as a major growth-inducing factor. This is further supported by the emergence of several private players that are providing additional healthcare benefits. Moreover, rapid technological advancements and digitization in healthcare processes, such as the adoption of cloud-based services and high-speed internet, have enabled transparent communication between involved parties, which is also fueling the market growth.
