NAUMD*

Luly Yang Couture won the best public safety product innovation award for the “Luly mask,” a PPE product that is functional and attractive. An innovative nose bridge, ear strap, and chin design offer convenient coverage, while filter pocket and 3D mesh offer increased safety and breathability.

In the category of garment innovation, function, CID Resources earned top honors for its WonderWink healthcare apparel. Renew is the first full-cycle sustainable line using five recycled water bottles into each garment. And the WonderWink Indy line withstands the rigors of industrial laundering.

For garment innovation, comfort, Elbeco is a top innovator. The company's CX360 uniform collection is a performance uniform designed for comfort and the demanding conditions of the streets. Features include button front shirt, three trouser styles and undervest shirt layered under protective vests.

The award for fabric innovation went to BeauTela for its eco-friendly corporate wear and uniform program. BeauTela's engineers have pushed the limits of what can be produced with recycled polyester. Their full range of products include kitchen uniforms, medical uniforms and sportswear.

Recognized for its RFID technology, Logistik Unicorp earned a best digital technological innovation award. The item level technology allows the firm to accurately track five million items that annually move through their warehouse. No options were commercially available for this vision.

"The uniform and image apparel industry outfits millions of workers every day. We proudly innovate to serve every hero that wears a uniform," noted Rick Levine, NAUMD executive director.

The awards were presented on October 26 in San Diego, CA, during NAUMD's "Heroes Wear Uniforms" Convention.
