Health coaches support and empower clients to improve unhealthy lifestyle habits to control chronic diseases such as diabetes. You are more likely to meet a health coach in private practice, at a doctor's clinic, or with a workplace wellbeing initiative. Wide self-insured businesses use coaching to boost employee wellbeing and minimize claims rates, as do health insurers. However, like coaching in general, the industry is poorly established and education in many cases is carried out by companies that are more interested in revenues than coach skills.

Growing awareness of behavioral and mental wellbeing is projected to have a huge effect on the health and wellness market. Behavioral wellbeing may be referred to as an analysis of the feelings and personality of a person linked to his or her emotional well-being. The accelerated speed of life of people today has had a significant effect on the well-being of people on a wide scale. According to a recent study published by the American Psychological Association in March 2019, the incidence of mood problems and suicide attempts among young adults in the U.S. have raised dramatically. This research also indicates that about 71 per cent of the youth population in the U.S., aged between 18 and 25 years, has experienced the extreme psychological distress, and 63 per cent of this age group has encountered depression. These results also suggest a strong prevalence of mental wellbeing problems that can be efficiently resolved by fitness coaches' wellness consultations.

Some businesses, educational institutions and other agencies hire in-house or external fitness coaches to provide health-related instruction to their staff or students. Addition to this increased case of obesity worldwide is leading to the various chronic diseases. Hence, the need for the proper health guidance is required in order to overcome the same, is another factor anticipated to fuel growth of the target industry in the near future. Further, during the lockdown situations across the globe in 2020 due to the COVID-19 outbreak, sudden changes in the lifestyle have led to mental illness among the global population. This factor has created huge demand for the health coaching and in turn propelled growth of the global market. However, lack of customization and less accountability along with lack any formal education among health coaches are among major factors expected to hinder growth of the target market in the near future. Nevertheless, companies in the health coaching market are hiring expert health coaches for providing the excellent consulting services to corporate consumers which will have positive impact on the growth of the target market.
