For workaholics, it often becomes a watershed moment where they have to choose whether their priorities lie with family or the workplace. David Hunter Moore recently spoke on why his entrepreneurial spirit was enhanced by the expectation of a first child.

At age 18, David Hunter Moore had started his first company with a lumping company. By age 20, he had also acquired a restoration company, Advantage One, renaming it Moore Advanced. He grew Moore Advanced into a 4M company and had started a waterfowl guide service by age 23. By 25, David Hunter Moore was able to fly helicopters and purchased his own Bell 206 Jet Ranger.

“With a daughter on the way, my focus has shifted to really consider her and her future,” he says. “All in all, I’ve led a boring workaholic life. Becoming a father is a milestone for any man says David Hunter Moore

Feelings of responsibility are one big difference fatherhood has made on David Hunter Moore's entrepreneurial mindset. In the past, many of his moves came down to his insight into the needs and strengths of others. He says he didn't feel a sense of responsibility as a young entrepreneur as much as he felt a sense of passion for bridging a gap in the market. Now, he is experiencing a natural feeling of responsibility—not only for his own daughter but also for the employees he has working for his five ventures.

"I'm learning how to condense my time so that I get work done and call it quits at a reasonable time," he explains. "It's not like I would ever walk away from my work, but I'm trying to make it part of my life instead of the central part of my life. This has really given me a new purpose that is driving my professional life, and it's definitely been a positive thing."

Having a new purpose gives Moore the "why" needed to reshape his business mindset and organize his approach, he says. Responsible entrepreneurs know why they do what they do. Moore says he is only experiencing increased success with his newfound approach to stop working so much and focus on a healthier work-life balance.
