Actinic keratosis is a skin condition that is caused due to prolonged exposure to sun. Also known as solar keratosis, it results in rough, scaly patches that appear on the hands, scalp, arms, lips, and other body parts. It can further result in the development of a skin cancer called squamous cell carcinoma. Cryotherapy, curettage, laser therapy, and photodynamic therapy are commonly utilized for the treatment of actinic keratosis.

The global market is majorly driven by the rising prevalence of actinic keratosis and the growing need for preventive strategies for cancer. This can be accredited to the depletion of ozone layer and excessive exposure to sun. Moreover, several public and private organizations across the globe are focusing on conducting campaigns to spread awareness regarding the availability of treatments for actinic keratosis. Some of the other factors contributing to the market growth include the increasing demand for minimally invasive (MI) procedures, significant investments in research and development (R&D) activities and the introduction of topical treatment for actinic keratosis that are known to reduce the risks of scarring.
